BERNADENE

Bernadene has proven to be very accurate in the predictions she gave during the past month. The events she predicted in the pages of the August issue of Here & Now, as well as those she gave on the Teddi & Micki show on August 13, have all occured already.

* Gerald Ford in the White House Within Weeks.
* Earthquakes in California -- they occured within hours of the prediction.
* Plane crashes -- two occured within hours
* More trouble with the "alphabet bomber"
* The Greek defeat on Cypress
* Revelations that Richard Nixon knew of the Watergate break-in soon after it took place.

On August 17 Bernadene spoke at the Holiday Inn in San Francisco before a capacity crowd of over 1,000 people. She spent the evening giving information to the audience, performing healing, and in making predictions, both of a personal nature and of national interest. We list below some of the new predictions she made that evening.

Editor's note: Predictions like these are made public in order to alert and inform people about dangers and opportunities. When such information is heeded, the dangers can often be avoided. When it is not heeded, opportunities can be missded. Psychic are pleased when their predictions of dire events are made invalid by the actions of people who have taken note of these predictions.

LATEST PREDICTIONS

* More earthquakes before the end of the year.
* In the coming weeks expect many natural disasters. Watch India and Japan. Hurricanes in Florida will affect the supply of fresh water by contaminating it with salt water.
* I feel great concern for the Secretary of State, Henry Kissinger. I feel that there will shortly be a power play, and Henry Kissinger will be out of office. He will have trouble while traveling out of the country.
* The Los Angeles bomber will be much in the news in the comind days. Another bomb will be placed in a crowded area. This man will be apprehended.
* In the coming weeks around the country and in Washington. D.C., there will be bombs, there will be violence, total uproar. The capital will be very strongly hit, this is a dangerous area.
* In California and Florida there will be a rash of UFO sightings; they will be much in the news. There will be an increasing number of reported physical contacts. UFO's are from another, more advanced, planet and are here to help.
* Leon Jaworski will experience his own crisis of confidence in the coming weeks. He will become involved in battles with the press. They will second quess his every move. He will not remain in his position if he bends to pressure. If he does he will be out of office within days.

* There will be screaming from around the world that former President Nixon is not being prosecuted.
* I see George Wallace walking towards me. He has reached a maturity and can do much for the country.
* Gerald Ford will remain in office only for a short time.
* The banks will have problems.
* I see a much brighter end-of-the-year for our country.
* I feel that a well known politician will commit murder, and take his own life because of it. This will be of the situation in Watergate.
* I feel deeply concerned about the choice of Vice-President. One man in the running now, should be changed.

After making the above predictions, Bernadene walked among the members of the audience, speaking and counseling with as many as possible. The evening closed with a very spiritual healing service.

For information concerning Bernadene's lectures, radio shows, and counseling contact UNI-COM, Box 11716, Palo Alto, Ca. 94306.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF ASTROLOGERS CONVENTION

During the week of August 13-19, the American Federation of Astrologers held their national convention in San Francisco. The well-organized event was attended by about 3,000 people. A bookstore was set up, and books on Astrology were gathered from all over the country to fell its shelves. Robert Berkey has told us that Robert Pelletier's book, "Planets in Aspect", sold over 700 copies in the first two days of the convention. (The very personable Mr. Pelletier, by the way, will appear in a future issue of HERE & NOW, in an interview taken at the AFA Convention.) Among the many noteworthy personalities present at this event were Isabel Hickey, and Edna Clark, one of the keynote speakers. (Our interview with Ms. Hickey will appear soon in HERE & NOW.) Ms. Clark's speech was among the more delightful of the convention. Dane Rudhyar was, as usual, enjoyed by his audience. Noel Tyl drew an audience of many students, each one seeming to gain much from his lectures and classes. Everyone was glad to see that Doris Chase Doan was able to be present. Zola Nichols presented a very interesting class on Child Guidance, illustrated with charts, and an informative discussion of the techniques used in counselling between mother and child. Many authors of astrology books attended the convention, including Lois Rodden, author of "The Mercury Method of Astrology"; Barbara Waters; Marcia Moore, author of several books; Marc Edmond Jones; Dr. Charneco, a clinical psychologist, who was also one of the excellent speakers we heard.

The convention, which covered every phase of the subject of astrology --- from products to show horse charts --- closed with a banquet and speaches. Everyone seemed to agree that the entire event had been a pleasure to attend, and definitely worthwhile.

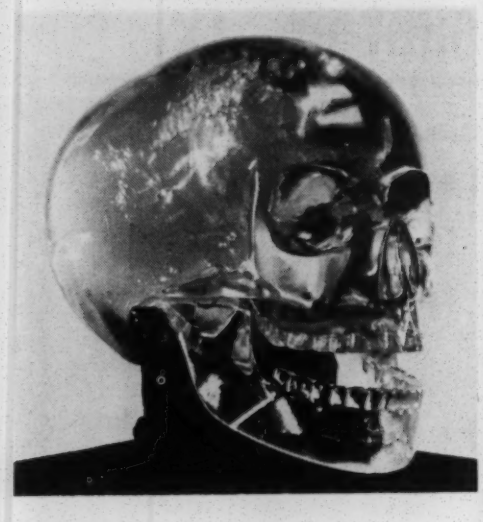
Crystal & The Aquarian Age

Dr. Frank Dorland

MY SIX YEARS WITH THE CRYSTAL SKULL

TEN YEARS AGO I was introduced suddenly into the crystal world. Up to that time, my wife Mabel and I had spent most of our lives in the field of art conservation —— that is, we maintained a scientific studio for the investigation, classification and restoration of paintings and other art objects. In October of 1964, while we were in New York City on business, one of our English clients gave us a full-sized skull of rock crystal to study and evaluate. We met this client in the Pinkerton offices while waiting for a limousine and guard to drive us to the airport with another valuable cargo of art. As we rode to the airport we discussed many details about this Crystal Skull, but we assumed at the time that it was just another of the many fascinating and puzzling pieces of art from the distant past.



We flew home to Mill Valley, California, where we began to study the Crystal Skull in our studio workshop. We soon realized that this was no ordinary object. During the first year, the Skull sang for us, perfumed the air, grew an enormous aura, and generally performed in an extremely unusual manner. Much of this has been reported in a book called "The Crystal Skull", written by author Richard Garvin using material from our files and experiences at our studio home. (The book is published by Doubleday, paperback by Simon & Schuster.)

Mabel and I had possession of the Skull for six years, and this newly opened window into another world convinced us that we should change our profession from art conservators to bio-crystallographers. As the world's first bio-crystallographers, we are pioneers in a little known area. All of our findings will be open to much critical research in the future, and this is as it should be. We do not expect always to have the last authoritative word. We are merely trying to open a door that has been nailed shut for ages and ages. We distinctly remember our experiences in 1967, 1968, and 1969, when we tried in vain to interest dozens of scientific academies and universities in looking at the Crystal Skull. Only one of them would pay even the slightest attention to what they all obviously thought was a trumped-up piece of nonsense. The president of the most dignified university on the west coast sent word via his socialite attorney, that neither he nor anyone else at his university wanted anything to do with the Skull. Just two years later this same university laid claim to leadership in the field of parapsychology.

Our studies indicate that the Skull is about twelve thousand years old in its sculpted form. The jawpiece was detached from the original mass a little over a thousand years ago so that the Skull could be used as a talking oracle. The Crystal Skull is not a symbol of death, but rather a representation of God's head —— the place of residence of the Universal Intelligence. This is why there is no flesh depicted on this beautiful skull: If flesh were added, the Skull would take on a racial aspect and would be thought of as Negroid or Chinese or Mongolian, or Indian, etc. By being fleshless, it is universal.

ROCK CRYSTAL & ITS HISTORY

The material from which the Skull was laboriously fashioned, over a period of hundreds of years, was rock crystal: a very hard, inert, and everlasting substance. Barring physical destruction by breakage, an object made of it will last indefinitely, since it does not oxidize or decay. It is so hard that it would be unlikely to wear out, even with continued use. Rock crystal is dazzling and shiny-bright, and as transparent as plate glass. It is many times harder than glass, and can be so pure and undefiled that the contamination-free test tubes used by scientists for doing radioactive carbon dating are made of it.

Rock crystal is the finest of all the many forms of quartz. The chemical name of quartz is "silicon dioxide", and most of the earth's crust is composed of this common material in the form called "silica". The sands of beaches and deserts, the gravel, sandstone, granite and other silaceous rocks we find almost everywhere —— these are all forms of silica.

When quartz crystals are exposed to the radiation which occurs naturally in many places in the earth's crust, electrons are displaced from atoms in the crystalline structure, resulting in the crystal taking on various shades of color —— from amethyst to light smoke, to a deep and mysterious transparent black. When chemical impurities are present, these tint the crystals in many shades of yellow, rose, blue and green. From conditions like these in quartz and other silicas arise our beautiful gemstones, such as beryl, zircon, carnelian, chrysophrase, agate, chalcedony, sardonyx, jasper, heliotrope, amethyst, garnet, lapis lazuli, tourmaline, opal, and topaz.

Some quartz crystals have piezoelectric properties; that is, they produce tiny amounts of electricity when squeezed and released. These crystals are used in electronics because they vibrate at precise frequencies. This controlled repeating vibration rate has made our modern world of communications possible. Telephone, radio, television, and satellite communications could not exist without this fascinating energy activity. Quartz timepieces and other recent advances in solid-state technology owe their existence directly to this crystal oscillation or to the knowledge derived from the phenomenon.

Rock crystals, the purest of all quartz crystals, are colorless, optically transparent, and naturally grown deep in the earth over many thousands of years. Because they look like huge diamonds, the ancients often assumed that rock crystals and diamonds were one and the same. They were long esteemed as heaven-sent talismans. One common ancient belief held that rock crystal was originally Holy Water that God himself spilled from heaven. As this Holy Water drifted earthward, it became frozen into ice in outer space. This Holy Ice was then miraculously petrified by the Guardian Angels so that it would forever remain cold, thus preserving the Holy Water in solid form as protection and blessings for mankind.

As a magical talisman, crystal has never been equalled in its potency and appeal. Ancient priests believed it to possess a God-given force which defied all evil, dissolving enchantments and hexes and nullifying all black magic. In fact, crystal is capable of making negative energy impotent and harmless, and it can be skillfully fashioned into powerful psychic tools, such as meditation stones, aura feelers, tiny crystal pendulums, carved pendants, crosses, crystal balls, and other items.

Crystal balls are of two main types. First, there is the "classical" type: the ground-and-polished sphere that is often exaggeratedly portrayed in the comics and in carnivals. And then there is the much older "psychic" type, which instead of being round is irregular in shape and has individual character. The latter type is very smooth and highly polished, and is often just the right size and weight to fit comfortably in the palm of the hand. Many experts believe that the Urim and Thummim of biblical fame were actually crystal balls of the psychic type. One line of evidence suggests that under the breastplate of the high priest was a leather sack containing twelve stones, among which were two divining stones: a small polished piece of smoky crystal and a small polished piece of clear crystal. These two crystals symbolized polarities, such as yes and no, night and day, up and down, guilty and innocent, or any other pair of opposing answers to questions that might be asked.

Crystal gazing, or "crystallomancy as it is often called, has been practiced for ages by statesmen, seers, world leaders and conquerors. But authentic crystal balls and other crystal pieces have always been scarce; hence, they have been found in the tombs of great leaders and royalty rather than in more general usage. Only about one in every two hundred crystal balls now in existence are real rock crystal; the rest are made of glass or plastic. Many are called "lead crystal", but this is still only glass. Authentic quartz crystal oscillates with both a positive and a negative field; neither glass nor plastic does —— if they did they would be used to replace the expensive crystal used in electronics. The fact that almost all crystal balls are mere imitations has led to a widespread misunderstanding of crystal gazing. Is it any wonder that crystal balls are jokingly referred to in literature and cartoons? Almost all of them are nothing but fakes.

True crystal gazing has been accurately defined as the science of inhibiting normal outward consciousness by concentrating on a smoothly polished crystal. When the five senses are thus drastically subdued, the psychic centers or receptors can function unimpeded. Exactly why this alteration of consciousness works so well is not precisely understood, but many scientists and psychologists believe there is an energy interchange between certain portions of the brain and the crystal. Thought waves are a form of energy, and propagate somewhat like radio waves. It is therefore believed that the crystal mass acts in some manner as a filtering antenna and amplifying reflector to the psychic receptor-centers of the subconscious. In this way, the brain's energy waves would stimulate the crystal, and in return the crystal would activate certain psychic centers.

Certain leading astrologers tell us that the transition into the Age of Aquarius started about 1890 and that a bit over three hundred years will be needed for the new age to get into full swing. The mineral symbol for the next two thousand years, then, will be quartz crystal. This coming Crystal Age, the Age of Aquarius, has been forecast for hundreds or even thousands of years. It promises to be a golden era of accomplishments unknown in the last thirty thousand years of earth history. Advanced crystal control will bring much higher levels of awareness and consciousness to human mortals. Recent research indicates that crystal talismans and tools can also bring spiritual growth and activity to sensitive individuals.

WHAT IS TRUTH?

DR. FRED W. ANDREWS

DR. PATRICIA A. ANDREWS

IN TODAY'S WORLD, students are continually being told that they must seek "the truth", or that they are being taught "the truth", or that an individual teacher or group or religion has "the truth". But what, really, is "the truth"? And if all these varying individuals and groups and religions and philosophies really do have the truth, then why do they differ one from the other; why are they not the same?

To begin, we must define what we, in Creative Living, mean by the term "truth". THE TRUTH, capitals, must be separated from "the truth", small letters. The latter can be defined as "my truth", or "your truth", or "our truth". THE TRUTH is unchanging and permanent: neither time nor increased spiritual understanding or awareness can possibly alter it.

The truth, small letters —— the individual truth from within —— is highly variable. When it is my truth or your truth, it is unique to me or to you. Even within church groups throughout the world, truth remains individual. Rarely will two people within an organization agree totally on every shade of meaning on every point of truth as set forth by the organization. Truth, small letters, is changeable. Nearly everyone will admit to having changed his beliefs at least once, and usually many times, during his lifetime. As history has shown, even the major religions change their truths.

Why these differences? Why can't people agree on the hereafter, the course of evolution, the way of reincarnation, our reason for being, or any of the myriad other things over which groups disagree? For Creative Living, the truth in this case is that this lack of agreement is due to a lack of conscious mind understanding. This lack of understanding also varies between individuals, and is dependent upon a number of variables: 1) How many lifetimes one has had; 2) how much acceptance of life one has had in those lifetimes; and 3) the resulting degree of spiritual awareness one has gained. As spiritual awareness increases through understanding, acceptance and love, new concepts can be accepted and conscious mind truths change.

Such changes are one cause of individuals' moving from group to group. All groups are truly stepping stones for spiritual growth. As such, none should ever be criticised or condemned. Each group is right for those individuals in it. If we can comprehend that we have many lessons to learn on our path towards THE TRUTH, and that these lessons take many forms throughout our varied lifetimes, we will become more accepting of other people and other ways.

As we look throughout the world at the confusion of individual truths, we need to ask ourselves, "How does one come to understand and increase his truth and ultimately to know and understand THE TRUTH?" Creative Living's answer —— its truth —— is that reincarnation is the first step on this path. The spirit within us, which lives from lifetime to lifetime, increases in awareness through our living in a physical body and learning to cope with all the variables which are inherent in that fact. This means that as we go through each lifetime, we must try to gain emotional acceptance of all the people, things and experiences with which we come in contact. Instead of blowing our stacks and reacting negatively to situations, we need to learn to accept and handle them calmly. As we are able, more and more, to react in this positive manner, we will gain spiritual growth through acceptance. This brings about changes in our individual truths.

It is one thing for our inner spirit to have increased awareness of its truth, however it is quite another for the conscious self to comprehend and understand its truth. The conscious mind may have many truths which differ from one's spirit truths. Such differences can cause internal conflict or mental and physical discomfort without our understanding why. It is therefore necessary for each person to learn, as we teach in Creative Living, how to contact his own spirit. With conscious mind contact of spirit, the increased awareness in one's spirit truth can be understood by the conscious self. When this occurs, the whole self —— conscious mind and spirit —— can work together as a single unit. One then functions more smoothly and comfortably within life's framework.

For the individual, conscious mind truth is that which he believes at the moment. Truth, small letters, can and does change. By contacting our own spirit, we can better understand our own truth and can encourage agreement between our conscious mind and spirit truths. No two people or groups see exactly the same truth. At present, no one can teach THE TRUTH; we can all teach only our own individual concepts of truth. For the students to whom a given teacher's concepts feel right, those concepts are right at that point in their lives.

When everyone has the same awareness and understanding, when there no longer are the varied philosophies, when there is total agreement in every detail of all spiritual concepts, then we will all have THE TRUTH.

Atlantean Fire Crystals

Dr. Dan Fry

THIS ARTICLE discusses two subjects which may at first glance seem to be far apart both in time and in basic nature. Both subjects, however, have their roots in Antiquity and one of them turns out to be the only adequate and logical explanation for the other.

The science of metaphysics has always had a deep interest in and great respect for crystals because of the many references in ancient languages to their unique natural properties and remarkable abilities. It has only been during the past few years, however, that crystals have begun to find their rightful place in the progress of the more conventional sciences. The chemist, of course, has always had a certain special interest in crystals because they represent the only completely natural assembly of atoms or molecules, each one of which has settled exactly into its proper spot in the solid crystal from the saturated liquid from which the crystal grows. The finished structure becomes one of great regularity and considerable beauty, as most of our precious jewels and gem stones demonstrate. But it was not until the scientist began to apply various forms of energy and forces to crystals that their true importance began to be realized. Even now they are far from being completely understood.

Because crystals are solids in which every particle is exactly in its natural place, each crystal constitutes a matrix of precisely balanced forces and fields. Any application of force to a crystal will therefore result in the generation of energy. Conversely, any application of energy will result in the generation of a force. Our present-day science is making many practical applications of these properties -- such as in the crystal microphone, in which the force of sound waves impinging upon a crystal causes it to generate an electrical potential, and in ultrasonic drills and vibrators, where the application of high-frequency electrical potential causes the crystal to undergo mechanical displacements which are then transmitted to some other part of the system. The maximum amount of energy that can be generated or transmitted by a crystal is limited only by its size and the material of which it is composed. Because of the precise lattice-like structure, the energy output can be controlled and directed in a very precise manner. For example, medical science is now producing laser beams so sharply focused that they can be used to cut into and to remove portions of individual body cells, which are themselves so tiny as to be invisible except under a strong microscope.

Today, many scientists pursuing various paths of scientific inquiry are attempting to rediscover and exploit the advanced art and science of crystallography that was lost during the last great collapse of science and civilization many thousands of years ago. These scientists could reach their goals much more quickly if they knew where to look and whether it is possible to look there. Our most ancient historical records tell us that beneath the left forepaw of the great Sphinx at Giza in Egypt there is a sealed compartment in which have been stored whole volumes of the scientific records of the past, together with samples or scale models of many of its devices and artifacts. During the course of my most recent investigative tour of Egypt, we were permitted to examine the exterior of the Sphinx as carefully as we wished, and while there was no opportunity for digging, I can nevertheless report that certain definite and repeatable deviations of the compass I carried indicated that a considerable quantity of magnetically permeable material is indeed located beneath the surface in the immediate vicinity of the left forepaw.

From those records of the lost civilization that are available, we can see something of the tremendous powers inherent in crystals. And in our own laboratories we are working almost feverishly to rediscover and to put into operation the same powers and abilities that our ancient ancestors used so widely and effectively. Our present laser systems are, as we have pointed out, one of the tangible results of such efforts. The output of the ruby crystal and the laser system is probably quite similar to that of the vril stick of which so much has been written in the ancient records. In the hands of the Supreme Ruler, who was the only person permitted to use the vril stick, it represented total authority, since it contained the power of life or death through the laser-like beam which it emitted. The vril stick employed a somewhat simpler and more compact system than any of those which we have yet been able to produce. But with our present rapid advance in miniaturization, we should soon begin to approach the results obtained by our remote ancestors.

The crystals produced by present-day technology are quite limited in size and their shape is determined almost entirely by the nature of the electrical fields within the molecules of which they are composed. The technology of Atlantis, however, had no such limitations. By growing their crystals within an area of precisely-controlled exterior electric and magnetic fields and by furnishing sufficient amounts of saturated solution, they were able to cause a single crystal to continue to grow almost indefinitely and to take on any one of a number of predetermined shapes. They then incorporated these huge crystals into devices and systems which, though relatively simple compared to some of our present technology, could nevertheless perform functions that would certainly cause our own best scientists to stare in awe and wonder. Tremendous forces acting over great distances could be produced readily. Electrical, magnetic, and even gravitational fields could be substantially altered, and significant changes in the time field could be produced, by the huge crystal-controlled systems of the Atlanteans. Whenever we bounce our tiny laser beams off the surface of the moon, as we have lately been doing, we are taking the first few child-like steps in the redevelopment of the Atlantean art.

In the Greek philosopher Plato's "Timaeus", or Theory of the Universe, and again in his "Crito", he described the history and culture of a long-submerged island continent, mentioning some of the incredible science with which they could control even the heavens. He named this continent "Atlantash", which is simply the plural form of the word "Atlas". In Greek mythology, Atlas was one of the Titans; he was the god who was believed to stand at the western extremity of the earth near the islands of the Hesperides, upholding the heavens with his shoulders. Poseidon, the god of the sea and brother of Atlas, was thought to dwell in the same locality in a huge and magnificent palace at the bottom of the sea, from which he occasionally rose to vent his wrath upon those who defied or ignored him.

Getting To Know Your Aura

Jean Thatcher

THERE WAS A TIME, we are told by our teachers, when the ability to see auras was not all that special. In those days, nobody had to learn to see auras; they just did. And it was back then that folks came up with a lot of the homely sayings relating to auric colors, which have been handed down to us along with the family jewels.

Have you ever wondered, for instance, why we specify 'black mood', or 'rose-colored glasses', or 'blue funk', or 'scarlet ladies', or 'red rage', or 'yellow cur', or 'green with envy'? Why not 'yellow mood' or 'scarlet cur' or 'green ladies'? Such color-coded phrases obviously evolved as the effects of emotions, personality, character and health upon the individual aura were noted by analytical observers.

Today, the colors of the aura are beyond the vibratory range which most students of metaphysics can perceive. Even developed mediums have difficulty seeing auras, and the ability is, for the most part, limited to those sensitives whose own vibrations have been sufficiently quickened by their understanding of spiritual truths. It is as though only those individuals capable of true compassion toward fellow beings are permitted a glimpse of the tender core of the inner man.

If you have never been fortunate enough to have seen an aura, look at the world around you through a crystal prism, such as those found on lamps or chandeliers. You will see that each object, animate or inanimate, is surrounded by an aura of pulsating colors. With the aid of the crystal, you are 'tuning in' to some of the frequencies at which molecules of the various objects vibrate —— frequencies outside the range normally perceived with the naked eye.

Most complex of all auras are those surrounding humans, since not only the molecular frequencies of physical bodies are involved, but those of etheric and astral bodies as well. An individual who is physically, emotionally and spiritually healthy will be surrounded by an egg-shaped aura approximately seven feet tall and four feet wide, with the narrow end of the egg toward the feet.

Following the contours of the physical body, the smokey white etheric counterpart is visible. This body, comprised of molecules less dense than those of our physical body, co-inhabits the same space and projects beyond it —— from a fraction of an inch up to six inches, depending upon the vitality of the individual at a given time.

It is the whitish light of the etheric body which developing mediums often see, long before they perceive the colorful astral aura. A peculiarity of the etheric is that it does not move in unison with the physical, but catches up with it in the same manner that iron filings catch up with a magnet drawn past them.

The etheric body may be visible as a detached phantom for varying lengths of time after death —— especially the sudden, violent death suffered by a healthy, vigorous person.

Outside the etheric, the astral aura glows and swirls, reflecting character, personality, health, moods and degree of spirituality. That portion of the aura around the head, above the eyes, is referred to as the halo, or nimbus. The golden-yellow halos of departed saints as depicted by the old masters were not mere figments of myopic painters' imaginations. Topping the halo, the colors flow up and over in a fountain of light known as "The Flowering Lotus".

The astral body, which interpenetrates the etheric body, is connected to the physical body by a mass of molecules vibrating at a tremendously high speed, referred to as "The Silver Cord". Stretching to the fineness of a thread during astral travel, this Silver Cord serves the physical body in the same capacity as the umbilical cord does the fetus before birth —— except, of course, that it acts on a spiritual rather than a physical level.

Encasing the aura is a transparent, tough, thin skin-like substance which undulates as the auric colors swirl, but which regains its general egg-shaped contour. On the outer surface of this 'skin', images from the brain are projected through the aura like pictures projected from a transmitting station through the ether to a TV screen.

Normally, the physical body is centered within the 'egg'. However, the body of a person suffering psychiatric illness will be off center, and individuals hosting dual personalities may have two egg-shapes joined at an angle, rather than the single egg.

Even if you have never actually seen an aura, you may be more aware of them than you realize. If you wear a lot of red, you are probably a vigorous, active person with a predominance of red in your aura. If green is your favorite color, and your clothing and decor reflect your preference, you are most likely a doctor, nurse or teacher with much clear green in your aura.

You will be attracted to others with similar auras: in other words, to those operating on the same frequencies. By the same token, you will be repelled by those having dissimilar auras. If you can't stand the sight of the girl who dresses in strange, offbeat colors, it is probably because your own halo is filled with colors that are clear and bright. Muddy, dull colors are the manifestation of low or disturbed vibrations; clear, pure colors indicate high vibrations, and never the two shall meet in total harmony.

Disfunction (dis-ease) in any part of the body is revealed by splotches of dull, or angry colors. Gray bands over an organ show that it is malfunctioning and needs immediate attention. A gray cloud intermingled with the halo reveals a headache. A brownish-yellow patch slashed by a gray blur over the kidney area denotes kidney stones. To those who perceive and understand auras, the health of any individual is an open chronicle. So too, is a subject's impending death revealed to them, when that person's aura fades and disappears.

Basically, the colors in the auric spectrum are: violet (spiritual development); indigo (religious convictions); blue (spirituality and intellectual ability); green (healing, energy); yellow (spiritual and moral health); orange (compassion, health); and red (life, vitality). Each of the basic colors have innumerable variations and striations whose complex meanings are gradually revealed to those who are ready to use the knowledge wisely.

Eileen Garrett, a gifted medium and for many years president of the Parapsychology Foundation in New York, stated that the "double" (etheric-astral) is the medium of telepathic and clairvoyant projection.

In the 1930's, Geraldine Cummins, English medium, said "Mind does not work directly on the brain. There is an etheric body which is the link between the mind and the cells of the brain —— the only channel through which mind and life may communicate with the physical shape."

Valentina and Semyon Kirlian electrified scientific circles during the last decade when their high frequency photography revealed a body or luminescence invisible to the naked eye —— a form of energy matrix penetrating all physical bodies. It was, they said, "some sort of elementary plasma-like constellation, made of ionized, excited electrons, protons and possibly other particles". At the same time, the Kirlians emphasized that the

It is important to realize that in Plato's time the western extremity of the earth was considered to be far out in the ocean we now know as the Atlantic Ocean. There is no evidence of Plato's having realized that the very legend of the Titans from which he borrowed the name Atlantash was actually the unwritten history, handed down verbally through the centuries, of a race of powerful human beings living on the continent of Poseidon (Atlantis) —— powerful, because they commanded great technological forces.

This is a very significant set of facts. Putting together concepts like these is much like putting together a jigsaw puzzle —— except that when you begin to put together a jigsaw puzzle, you have all of the pieces to begin with, whereas in a case like this you must first go all over the world, gathering together the parts of the puzzle and then putting them together. We have here a situation in which a certain area of the Atlantic Ocean (the "Bermuda Triangle") has been known for many centuries to have startling and unexplainable properties. It was necessary even in pre-Grecian times to postulate a whole series of gods to explain the things that occured there. For example, some of the dire events that happened in the world could be explained by saying that the god Atlas sometimes got tired of holding the heavens on his shoulders, and would shrug. But strange things often happened out beyond the Hesperides that could not be explained by saying that Atlas shrugged. So another god was invented: Poseidon, who lived in a huge palace beneath the sea. Both Atlas and Poseidon represented, in personified form, the sunken continent where there existed a science that even to this day has not been rediscovered, and where technology gave the inhabitants such great power that the less advanced societies of that era considered them to be gods.

The late Edgar Cayce, in his book on Atlantis, mentions the all-powerful crystal systems. On page 86 he writes: "In Poseidia the entity dwelt among those that had charge of the storage of the motive forces from the great crystals that so condensed the lights, the forms of the activity, as to guide the ships in the sea and in the air ...". Again on page 87: "... in Atlantean land at time of development of electrical forces that dealt with the transportation of craft from place to place ... overcoming gravity itself, preparation of the crystal, the terrible the mighty crystal ... ". Apparently some of these systems made use of energy accumulators coupled to natural energy sources and were designed to operate automatically when triggered by some specific or predetermined stimulus. They required no human control or maintenance, and were practically impervious to the destructive forces of time. At least two, and probably more, of these periodically operating devices are apparently still in operation and still performing part of their designed function after thousands of years of immersion in the Atlantic Ocean. This is not surprising —— after all, crystals that occur in Nature are often several billion years old. Substances as durable as that are not likely to be changed very much by a few thousand years of immersion in the sea.

When the continent of Atlantis, or Poseidon, descended into the depths, it took with it not only a whole nation of people, but some of the most remarkable technology ever created upon this planet as well. This was a people which worked with the natural laws instead of using one to overcome another, as we have fallen into the habit of doing. Their systems were, on the whole, somewhat simpler and less bulky than ours. Yet they were capable of producing results which we are not yet able to duplicate or, in some cases, even able to understand. Not only was this civilization aware of the many huge space ships which had for countless generations cruised the galaxy, but it had established firm commercial relations with the galactic confederation. This is obvious even from the fragmentary evidence we have at present about the technology of Atlantis.

The transportation of goods between the earth and the space ships did, however, present some difficulties. Because of the intense resonating fields produced by the propulsion systems of the huge ships and the tremendous degree of ionization that would be created in any atmosphere through which they moved, it was not practical for them to come closer than a few hundred miles to the earth's surface. And no matter how the lifting was done, the earth's gravitational field still taxed the energy available for the transfer operation. This problem was solved by applying the technology of crystalline systems to the metaphysical phenomenon called "apport", or "apportation". Apport is a phenomenon in which an object ceases to occupy one point and occupies some other (possibly remote) point without having occupied any of the points in between.

Somewhere off the east coast of Florida, under many fathoms of water, one or more of these Atlantean crystal driven apportation systems still exists, and still performs at least some of its original functions. Unaffected by time or its surroundings, and powered by energy accumulators drawing their energy from natural sources, it can be triggered by some specific impulse or signal. When this occurs —— as it often does —— any solid matter within its range of operation is suddenly switched from its original location to some possibly distant point. Since no detailed descriptions of this device are available to us, we can learn more about it only through a careful and complete study of its performance and its effects upon other objects during those brief but fateful periods when it comes into operation. Since many such demonstrations have occured, many of them documented in precise detail, and since they continue to occur rather frequently, a substantial body of dependable data exists that would furnish a sound basis for such a study. This data covers a period of more than 150 years and involves the area commonly known as "The Bermuda Triangle" —— defined geographically roughly as a rectangle bounded on the north by a line stretching from Bermuda to the Virginia coast, on the south by the islands of Cuba and Hispaniola. This stretch of ocean, dotted with a few islands which are the only visible remnants of the Atlantean continent, has been the scene of more unconventional and inexplicable disappearances than any equivalent area on earth. In the past hundred years 42 ships and 27 planes have vanished here, without warning and without a trace. These are all cases in which the weather was moderate and no distress calls were sounded. Ships or planes lost to storms, fires, or other normal hazards are not counted in this list. In spite of the widest possible search and rescue operations, no wreckage, no debris, no survivors, and not even an oil slick were ever found.

Here are the names of just a few of the ships lost in this manner: the Swedish-owned Lotta, which disappeared in 1866; the Spanish merchantman Viego, in 1868; the British training ship Atlanta, in 1880; the Irish schooner Miramarne, in 1884; the American collier Cyclops, in March of 1918. Similar disappearances have occured every two or three years since then, and will undoubtedly continue to occur in the future unless the exact location of the events is somehow determined and those spots avoided.

Attempts have been made to explain the loss of these craft by such things as mid-ocean earthquakes ("seaquakes") which might raise tidal waves (or "tsunamis") as high as several hundred feet. Such waves might swallow a ship so suddenly and completely that there would be no time for a distress call or the launching of life boats. But the tsunami theory, like so many other attempted explanations, raises questions more difficult than those which it tries to answer. In the first place, a tsunami, once it has been created, will roll on and on with little loss of energy until it encounters some land surface. Tidal waves started in the Indian Ocean have had a measurable effect upon our west coast after thousands of miles of travel across the ocean. A major tsunami generated anywhere in the Bermuda Triangle would be at least 100 feet high when it reached the Florida coast, where it would proceed to roll over about half the state, destroying everything in its path. If such a thing had happened in the past 150 years, someone would certainly have noticed it. We are also faced with the necessity for explaining the equally abrupt disappearance of some 27 or more airplanes in midflight; it is difficult to imagine a tidal wave high enough to snatch up an airplane flying at 10,000 feet.

One of the most significant and best-documented cases of a plane disappearance is that of the famous flight 19, consisting of five TBM Avenger bombers which on December 5, 1945, took off on a routine patrol flight from the U.S. Naval Air Training Station at Ft. Lauderdale, Florida. Most printed reports state that the weather was clear and the flying conditions excellent. My personal examination of the weather reports of that day indicated that there were a few broken clouds and a small amount of wind. However there were no weather conditions which would endanger a short routine patrol of this kind. The flight leader's plane had a crew of two, while the remaining four planes carried three men each. All of the 14 pilots and crewmen had flight and navigation experience ranging from 13 months to 6 years. The planes were expected to make a short triangular patrol, flying east for 160 miles, then north for 40 miles, and then directly back to the base at Ft. Lauderdale —— a total flight time of about an hour and forty-five minutes.

The flight left at 2 PM and their routine called for them to contact the tower at 3:45 PM for landing instructions. The message actually received at that time was anything but routine. "This is an emergency, this is an emergency, this is an emergency!" said the flight leader's fearful voice. When asked for his position, he replied, "We are not sure of our position. We can't be sure of where we are —— we just don't know." The statement seemed absurd. Here were five bombing planes, equipped with the latest navigational equipment —— equipment sophisticated enough to allow bombing targets to be pinpointed purely by instrument in conditions of zero visibility. The tower man then said, "Well, if you don't know where you are, for God's sake fly to the west. The entire continent of North America lies to the west of you. You can't miss it." The flight leader replied, "We can't be sure which way is west. We cannot be sure of any direction. Everything is wrong. Everything is strange. The ocean doesn't look as it should. It seems to be boiling. The air is red." By this time the sun was nearing the western horizon, and when the tower operator sarcastically suggested that they head toward the sun because it usually sets in the west, asking whether they had forgotten that, the flight leader made the shocking statement neither sun nor clouds were visible in the strange sky through which they were flying. For nearly thirty minutes thereafter the tower could hear the planes talking to each other. It was obvious that none of the five pilots nor any of the nine crewmen had any idea of their position, even though all of them were experienced in aerial navigation. And it was incredible that all navigational instruments would fail on all five of the planes simultaneously. The overheard conversation showed increasing signs of fear and hysteria among the pilots. Then the flight leader abruptly turned the command over to another plane —— an act which generally occurs only during the most desperate of emergencies. He said, "Look, boys, you're on your own. I can't do anything more for you." At about 4:15, the control tower received its last message from the flight. It said, "We still cannot be certain where we are. We don't know, but we should be about 225 miles northwest of base. It looks like we are ..." and at this point the message broke off, instantly and completely.

A Martin flying boat with full rescue equipment and a crew of thirteen was immediately dispatched to search for the missing flight and to bring back these stupid pilots who couldn't find west with all of the navigational equipment available on military bombing planes. The rescue plane made several routine radio reports and then lapsed into silence. Neither this plane nor any of the original five bombers were ever heard from again, nor was any sign of them ever found, despite one of the largest air and sea rescue efforts in American history. The aircraft carrier Solomon was in the vicinity, and by noon of the next day dozens of ships and over 300 planes had joined the search. They covered every square yard of ocean over which these planes could possibly have flown. Not a single item of wreckage was found, even though the Martin rescue craft had been carrying life-preservers, life rafts —— literally hundreds of items which should have risen to the surface and continued to float indefinitely, no matter how hard the plane had hit the water.

After an exhaustive investigation of the incident in which a total of 27 lives had presumably been lost, the Navy was unable to come up with any explanation for it. The final report stated simply: "This commission has been unable to make any progress in its investigation."

A little more than two years later, on January 29, 1948, a 4-engine commercial airplane belonging to the British South American Airways Co., with 34 passengers and a crew of six were en route to Kingston, Jamaica. The weather was clear and mild. At 10:30 PM a routine report was made to the control tower at Bermuda. This was the last message ever received from the airliner. No evidence was ever found that would indicate a crash into the ocean or anywhere else —— no wreckage, oil slick or debris. The plane with its passengers and crew had simply vanished.

Again on January 7, 1949, another 4-engine airliner, also belonging to British South American Airways, with seven crewmen and thirteen passengers,took off from Bermuda at 7:30 AM in excellent weather, bound for Jamaica. At 8:15 there was a routine report, and then silence. As in the previous case, there was no SOS, and no sign of wreckage. The British Ministry of Aviation made a thorough investigation of the above cases, but could only report that the planes had "presumably been lost at sea" —— an undeniable premise, but not very enlightening.

In January of 1960, a convoy of five planes was en route to New York from Puerto Rico when two of the planes suddenly disappeared in midflight, without having given any sign of distress. The weather was good and the planes had all been flying within visual range of each other. Again, no trace was ever found of the missing planes.

These are only four out of many very similar and well documented cases. In every case, the involved planes were flying in mild weather, in level flight, with no known problems. Yet, suddenly they were no longer there.

On May 26, 1968, the USS Scorpion, an 8-year-old 252-foot nuclear attack submarine, was homeward bound from Mediterranean duty. When it was just southwest of the Azores, it radioed ahead that all was going according to schedule, that it expected to arrive at its base in Norfolk, Virginia, within the week, and that its 99 officers and men would be most happy to be home after the long cruise. After six days had passed without any further word from the sub, Navy officials began to make continuous efforts to establish radio contact —— but to no avail. A massive nine-day air and sea hunt followed, after which the sub was finally listed as lost. An official Navy board of inquiry convened in Norfolk in an attempt to determine the cause of the disaster, but reached no conclusions.

There have been half-hearted efforts by several departments of the federal government to probe the mystery of the Bermuda Triangle. In January of 1946 a group of naval intelligence officers was ordered by President Truman to form a "central intelligence group" which eventually became the CIA. A series of secret hearings, in which this central intelligence group and the relatives of the missing Flight 19 all participated, was held in Washington, D.C. in the spring of that year. Although most of those concerned later refused to divulge what transpired at this meeting, the mother of one of the missing flyers did say that she thought her son "might be still alive, perhaps somewhere in space".

In 1965 and 1966 the National Bureau of Standards undertook a project in which special microphones capable of picking up sounds above the audible range were installed off the coast of Florida. Some results were reportedly obtained, but no conclusions have been announced.

In an interview in 1968, a spokesman for the Coast Guard Search and Rescue Branch said, "Quite frankly, we don't know what is happening in this so-called Bermuda Triangle. All we can do about these unexplainable disappearances is to speculate." The Navy is trying to get to the bottom of the mystery with an operation called "Project Magnet", in which they are investigating electromagnetic, gravitational, and atmospheric disturbances. Some experts think that such disturbances might be able to cause the disintegration of overflying aircraft.

If the Atlantean apportation device is indeed the cause of this apparently endless chain of disappearances, then where might all of these planes, ships, and submarines be taken by this device? Could the destination be, perhaps, another planet? Another dimension? A parallel state of existence? Or even another time? Until someone who has undergone the experience of apportation by the Atlantean device manages to return, we can only speculate about such things.

While the total number of vanished ships and planes is actually greater than is generally realized, as my own recent investigations have shown, it is nevertheless obvious that the apportation mechanism operates only at certain points at certain times and under certain conditions. After all, not everything that sails or flies through the Bermuda Triangle disappears. If it did, this region would long ago have ceased to be used as a transportation route.

The great mystery of the Bermuda Triangle is likely to remain a mystery until either we succeed in developing a technology of crystalline systems similar to that of the Atlanteans, or the ocean bottom under the Bermuda Triangle rises above the ocean surface once again and exposes the ancient apportation system to view. The ocean bottom in this area does seem to be rising at a rather rapid rate (rapid, at least, from a geological standpoint), and so it may not be long before the Atlantean Fire Crystals, together with their activating mechanisms, can be studied at close range.

energy was not just particles: not a chaotic system. It was, they insisted, an entire unified organism in itself.

They found that if part of the living "body" (plant, animal, etc.) was cut away, the entire bioplasmic "body" remained in a high frequency field, clearly discernible to the shrewd eye of their camera. If the energy body disappeared, the plant or animal died.

Scientists studying the Kirlian photography found that exposure to various colors changed the activity of the bio-plasma, causing specific oscillations to occur.

In short, auras are effect, not cause. They change as individuals progress or regress. They respond to mental and emotional attitudes and to physical conditions such as food and environment. According to the scientists, they even respond to color.

Edgar Cayce, one of the world's great mediums, said shortly before his death in early 1945, "Colors reflect the soul and the spirit, the mind and the body, but remember: They indicate lack of perfection, incompleteness. If we were all we should be, pure white would emanate from us. Strive toward that, and when you see it in others, follow it as if it were a star. It is. But we who must take solace from smaller things can draw comfort from blue, get strength from red and be happy in the laughter and sunshine of golden yellow."

SPIRITUAL FRONTIERS FELLOWSHIP CONFERENCE

August 18-22 brought together many members and friends of the Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship for a week of classes and meditation. Among the keynote speakers were: Dr. Edgar Jackson, Robert Ashby, Asysoun Ford, Dr. Frances V. Clark, Alan Vaughan, and Dr. Lee Sanella. HERE & NOW was fortunate to have been able to obtain the following two intervies, one with Rev. Francis Geddes, organizer of the retreat, and the other with Dr. Jackson. Rev. Geddes has been minister of the First Congregational Church of San Rafael, California.

H&N: Reverend Geddes, what is the purpose of the convention here, and what do you want to convey to the public?

Geddes: The purpose of the retreat is essentially the purpose of the entire Spiritual Frontiers organization: to provide a bridge between the church and a wider understanding of what human nature is all about. We're limited, I think, in our current scientific view of human nature's capabilities. The psychic dimension is one kind of expanding, one broadening way of looking at what it means to be human, and our interest in the psychic is primarily that it provides better understanding of the psychic events in the Old and New Testaments. These are psychic events that actually help us to understand our spiritual capacity. To the degree that we are able to understand our nature as essentially spiritual, we are capable of some of the psychic experience of the psychic events. For example, the Christian faith came out of the resurrection experience, and for the last three hundred years that has been for our society a kind of symbol rather than an actual event. Consider healing. Healing happens all around us. But in our culture, cominated as it is by a scientific world view---a materialistic world view---, healing is primarily womething that comes out of physical medicine. We at Spiritual Frontiers in no way put down physical medicine (our healers always insist on cooperating with physical medicine and with the physician), but there is a dimension that goes beyond physical medicine. And this kind of healing ought to take place in the Church, where it started. Many people in the Church today are not aware of their heritage. Those who are aware of it may read the New Testament and come to the conclusion that it is the product of primitive monds of superstitious people, and that we don't really have any abilities to heal. Our conviction here is that the life of prayer, of healing and meditation, and of life after death---all these need to come back into the life of the Church.

H&N: What position would you expect the Church to take on the issue of life after death?

Geddes: Life after death would be looked upon, not as some kind of symbolic expression of Christian faith, but as a reality. I imagine that some Christian ministers today have a real difficult time with their Easter sermons, because the Easter sermon potentially proclaims the reality out of which the Christian Church grew. On the original Easter morning, the people encountered the risen Christ; they encountered a human being. Was this an apparition? Or was the event on the road to Emmaus a rematerialization? From the accounts of Jesus eating the fish, we might say that it was a rematerialization. I'm not really wedded to one interpretation or the other, but I am convinced that the disciples really waw Jesus on Easter morning and really talked to him. The story is not a symbol; it is not a mysterious thing shrouded in some kind of ancient past that we have no access to.

I think the people in the Church, as well as every person alive, has the ability to heal. Spiritual Frontiers is trying to open up an awareness of latest human abilities. This goes back to some of the roots of the Christian faith that have been allowed to wither. They haven't been watered; they haven't been tended to. Healing is one of these roots.

H&N: How do you think we, the people in parapsychology and metaphysics, can bring people in the Church back to what they left?

Geddes: I think you would have to start where most people are. They have really "bought" the value system of our culture---the materialistic explanation of what religion is all about. We can bring out as many physicists, as many chemists, and psychotherapists as we want, and say, "All right, let's start with this or that technical language, and then we'll move through people like Marcel Vogel, we'll move through people like Edgar Jackson, who does healing. We'll take a non-religious healer like Larry Lachon, and realize he has developed his healing techniques through meditation and a study of religious healers." So, we begin where humanistic psychology is---that's the present language of the culture. We start with a language everyone can agree on. Then we say, "Let's take another look at the New Testament. Let's take another look at the Christian faith through another set of lenses."

There are many old terms---like "communion of saints". That term had a great deal of meaning 500 years ago, the "communion of saints" being those who have gone into a non-physical realm and yet remain a part of the living Church. I have a lot of conviction that there is a resource of power, energy, and love in that body of saints. They are Christians who are in another realm of being, but they are still a part of the Church.

H&N: And they can still teach us?

Geddes And they can still teach us. And we'll still receive their love. They're part of the Church. In the scientific world, they wouldn't exist, since, according to science, what you can't see and measure is simply not there. That's the dominant attitude in the life of most congregations---"If you can't see it, and can't measure it, then it's not there."

H&N: Ministers sometimes seem to be confined to the scientific world, too.

Geddes: Unfortunately, the theological education they receive in the seminaries does not really equipm them to deal with religious experience, meditation, and mystical prayer. Faculties of seminaries are very afraid of religious experience, I think. They are not really equipped to teach it.

H&N: Perhaps they feel they might lose control if they did teach it.

Geddes: Whatever the reason, it has certainly resulted in the Church's having been sort of deprived. I don't think it was a willful thing. It may have been a kind of ignorance, a pendulum swing. A highly rationalistic kind theological and literary criticism dominates a lot of New Testament scholarship. This was a pendulum swing away from the time when there was superstition, there was distortion, when there was a lot of reason to say, "We've got to move out of the Dark Ages." Well, I feel we've thrown the baby out with the bath water, so to speak. There is so much thrown out that the spirit doesn't have a real opportunity to move and to live. I think that is the saddest thing about the Church today. People are having to explore outside of it walls in order to find some really fine spiritual nourishment--to have any religious that they can feel in their viscera rather than in their heads.

H&N: Is this the reason why people are leaving the Church?

Geddes: Yes. Yet, within the churches there is a minority, an underground. There are all sorts of Christian communities---people who are creating Christian Selves outside of the institutional structure. Each one is different——there's a beautiful uniqueness evolving. They are not linked together, but there is a kind of underground which is alive and well and still wants to be part of the Christian community. I feel it will not always be underground; it will grow, and I think the Church will be influenced and renewed by it.

H&N: The world really seems to need something like that.

Geddes: Yes, it does.
